Shawn Ostertag thought coyotes in his back yard were "kind of cool" until he saw one pounce at his side door, trying to get to his cat.

"My cat was freaking out," he said.

Advertisement Now Ostertag and other residents of Houston Acres, a small city off Taylorsville Road, say coyotes have become a threat and they want them killed.

"People are scared," Ostertag said.

His neighborhood and others in eastern Jefferson County have reported more coyote sightings in the past year.

As many as 20 coyotes might be in the Houston Acres area, said Keith Stucker, head of the Louisville office of the U.S. Department of Agriculture's Wildlife Services.

"The reports we have received have shown increasing aggression toward pets," he said, adding that his office has received about 20 complaints this year from around Jefferson County.

Houston Acres residents and Louisville Metro Council member Kevin Kramer, R-11, have persuaded the USDA to trap and kill coyotes in the area, using lethal injections, for $4,300.

Kramer said he might pay half the cost with money from metro government, and Houston Acres is trying to come up with the rest.

The animals also have been seen in subdivisions off Breckenridge Lane and Hurstbourne Parkway, including Brookhollow, Four Seasons, Stony Brook Woods, Westwood Farms and Breckenridge Estates East, Kramer said.

Coyotes rarely were seen in suburban Louisville 30 years ago, according to Kramer said the coyotes could be coming from a 140-acre farm off Taylorsville Road, which includes some woods that border Houston Acres. Farm owner and Bullitt County publisher Nick Simon said he has seen three or four at a time.

But David Maehr, associate professor of conservation biology at the University of Kentucky, said killing coyotes won't thin their numbers because others will take their place. Once they establish themselves in a suburban area, they stay, he said.

He and other wildlife experts say coyotes are becoming a more common in suburban areas throughout the United States because development is claiming their habitat and they can easily find food in neighborhoods.

She suggested that people keep their pets inside and keep their garbage inside their homes or garages until the morning it's collected.

Boyles said PETA would write a letter to Houston Acres, encouraging the city not to kill the coyotes.

She said coyotes are helpful, even in suburban areas, because they keep rodent and rabbit populations in check and eat animals without predators like deer.

Maehr agreed that coyotes are beneficial. They eat common pests ranging from rodents to grasshoppers, he said.

It's legal to hunt coyotes any time in Kentucky, including in Louisville, and they may be trapped from Nov. 14 to Feb. 28. Laura Patton, a wildlife biologist at the Kentucky Department of Fish and Wildlife Resources, said some people trap them for their pelts.

None of the Houston Acres area residents are talking about hunting coyotes themselves, but many want them destroyed.

Houston Acres City Commissioner Ed Hardison thinks that coyotes might have eaten his dog, Mugsy. His wife Jo Ann was walking the Cairn terrier when he came off his leash and made a beeline into the woods.

"I could hear him whimpering but I just couldn't get to him," Jo Ann Hardison

John Burke, president of the Brookhollow homeowners association, said he's

"It's like any other animal population -- if they're bad and they're coming in the city and they're wild, there's got to be some plan of action," he said. "They're just going to keep multiplying."

Residents of Houston Acres, off Taylorsville Road, said that coyote sightings are on the NewsChannel 32 reported.

Ed Hardison said he believes coyotes ate his 2-year-old dog, Mugsy, last winter. Other 1 said the animals have gone after their pets, and they're getting worried.

"Even during the daytime, they would walk up into your yard where even all the experts won't see this,' but we're seeing it," Hardison said.

USDA officials are suggesting euthanize program for the animals, but Houston Acres residents, and about seven other communities, are still trying to figure out what they'll do about the coyotes.
